How the score works

Every non-financial stock in the Bull Rankings universe gets a single 0–100 quality-growth score. One number that answers: is this a great business, growing fast, at a fair price? (Banks, insurers and REITs are graded on a separate financial-strength scale.)

QUALITY

Durable returns on the capital a business uses, healthy margins, real cash generation and manageable debt. Return on invested capital leads the quality score; return on equity, profit and free-cash-flow margins, debt, earnings quality and dividends or buybacks fill in the picture.

GROWTH

Revenue growth over the last year and over several years, plus analysts' forward earnings estimates. The model wants real, sustained expansion, not one lucky quarter.

VALUE

What you pay for that business: the PEG ratio, free-cash-flow yield against sector peers, EV/EBIT, and today's P/E against the company's own history. A great business at 50x earnings can still be a bad buy.

Scores blend the three pillars. Each metric on a stock's page is graded A (strongest) to F (weakest). The model is unemotional: it doesn't care about hype, headlines, or whether you've heard of the company.

How to use this sheet

1. Start with the score, not the story.

The model is unemotional. Use the ranking as your first filter, then do your own research on the names that survive it.

2. A PEG under 1.0 is the classic line.

It means you are paying little for each point of earnings growth. 17 of these 30 clear it. When a high-growth name also has a low PEG, pay attention.

3. Watch the movers, not just the leaders.

A stock jumping 3 or more points means something changed: its business, its price, or both. The daily movers are where new ideas come from.

4. Respect the price.

A great business at 50x earnings can still be a bad buy. That's why a cash machine like NVIDIA ranks #7 instead of #1: its value score is its weakest.

5. This sheet expires. The site doesn't.
